

Hamburg Institute of International Economics (HWWA) (Ed.)

Article — Digitized Version

Recycling: The logic of the kissinger plan

Intereconomics

Suggested Citation: Hamburg Institute of International Economics (HWWA) (Ed.) (1975) : Recycling: The logic of the kissinger plan, Intereconomics, ISSN 0020-5346, Verlag Weltarchiv, Hamburg, Vol. 10, Iss. 3, pp. 69-, <https://doi.org/10.1007/BF02929564>

This Version is available at:

<https://hdl.handle.net/10419/139161>

Standard-Nutzungsbedingungen:

Die Dokumente auf EconStor dürfen zu eigenen wissenschaftlichen Zwecken und zum Privatgebrauch gespeichert und kopiert werden.

Sie dürfen die Dokumente nicht für öffentliche oder kommerzielle Zwecke vervielfältigen, öffentlich ausstellen, öffentlich zugänglich machen, vertreiben oder anderweitig nutzen.

Sofern die Verfasser die Dokumente unter Open-Content-Lizenzen (insbesondere CC-Lizenzen) zur Verfügung gestellt haben sollten, gelten abweichend von diesen Nutzungsbedingungen die in der dort genannten Lizenz gewährten Nutzungsrechte.

Terms of use:

Documents in EconStor may be saved and copied for your personal and scholarly purposes.

You are not to copy documents for public or commercial purposes, to exhibit the documents publicly, to make them publicly available on the internet, or to distribute or otherwise use the documents in public.

If the documents have been made available under an Open Content Licence (especially Creative Commons Licences), you may exercise further usage rights as specified in the indicated licence.

the majorities among the developing countries since the states of the Third World choose to act in the UN as if they were an undiversified bloc and to condemn, and outvote, the industrialized states as a malignant influence in the world. As far as the EC's development aid is concerned, it is also true that it has been of almost exclusive benefit to French and British ex-colonies and thus to the foreign policy of these two countries while it was left to the Federal Republic to shoulder a major part of the financial burden.

Despite all these annoyances — which must be removed at least partially — one should beware of using development aid as a carrot in economic policy and whip in foreign policy. A decision to this effect may go down very well at home, but as far as foreign policy is concerned, it could only do harm — if not now, then later. For the upshot would be that the recipients of bilateral aid would feel themselves to be economically dependent upon the Federal Republic and be afraid of its political influence. For these reasons it is to be hoped that the German development policy is in for a shift of emphasis only and not a change of course. kw.

Recycling

The Logic of the Kissinger Plan

Dear oil should not present insuperable payments problems for any industrialized country in the West in future — provided, it must be added, that the Kissinger plan adopted by the Club of Ten in the middle of January proves workable. The plan provides for a $ 25 bn solidarity fund to be administered by the BIS in which only OECD members will participate.

This plan was for a long time fiercely contested because it keeps the developing countries outside and is not anchored to the IMF. The logic of the plan must in the end have convinced all the doubters in spite of this criticism. The indisputable aggravation of the balance of payments problems pressing on many developing countries is in the final analysis an outcome of the oil price policy of the OPEC states. Theirs should therefore be the task of easing these problems in an appropriate manner.

For the industrialized countries as a group the problem is not so much one of creating liquidity as of distributing liquidity. The bulk of the surplus petro-dollars will in any case be invested with them although individual countries will share in them to varying degrees: the oil bills will not in every single case be balanced by the inflow of petro-money. The solidarity fund is to intervene at this point but only if the country concerned rationalizes its energy consumption at the same time and attempts to add to its internal energy supplies. This linkage of liquidity distribution with internal energy policy is the justification for keeping the fund apart from the IMF. Besides, recycling would not otherwise be a practicable means of effecting the necessary economic adjustments without major disruptions. Such adjustments are indispensable if the forecasts of an end of the petro-dollar glut by 1980 already are to be proved correct. kb.

EC — Comecon

Changed Realities

For years the Kremlin has been refusing to recognise the reality of the EC. Only since late 1972 have there been signs that the Soviet attitude is changing. Party chief Brezhnev himself let it be known that the Soviet Union could not close its eyes to the existence of the Common Market in Western Europe. The contacts which ensued have now led to the first official negotiations of an EC delegation with representatives of the Comecon secretariat in Moscow. These talks were of crucial political importance because they signalize the end of a long period during which the two big economic blocs in Europe were ignoring each other.

The Kremlin was probably prompted by two considerations to attempt a rapprochement with the EC. One is that the Kremlin may find it expedient to temper the strain on the relationship between Comecon and EC, if only formally, in order to create a favourable atmosphere for the European security conference in Geneva which Moscow wants very much to be a success. The second and perhaps more important reason is of an economic nature. At the beginning of this year the EC member states surrendered their powers in the sphere of trade policy to Community organs: they are no longer free to conclude trade agreements directly with third countries. This prohibition can admittedly be circumvented to some extent through cooperation agreements but the latter cannot cover all facets of economic relations, especially if Moscow lays store upon a long-term extension of these relations with Western Europe. Since the clash over trade policy with the USA the Soviets' interest in this direction has probably grown further. Changing realities have now created the prerequisites for a modus vivendi between the two blocs in spite of all the differences between the organisations and their consequences. ogm.